

Learning from Experience of Mental Healthcare in United Kingdom, Hong Kong and China

How to develop better mental health services for people suffering from mental disorders? How to keep the balance between community-based and hospital-based mental health care? Should the most important part of the mental health care be delivered at community level, but not hospital level? This symposium will provide evidence on establishing, developing and evaluating modern mental health services. Key relevant experience and problems of mental health care in contemporary UK, mainland China, and Hong Kong will be discussed.
