

Climate Change: A Case for Interdisciplinary Education

Abstract

The world has overall become a better place for humanity during the past century. Many of the improvements in the human condition correspond to an unprecedented emission of greenhouse gases, altering our planetary climate system. This public talk, open and accessible to a general academic audience, describes why understanding global climate change and taking successful action on this urgent issue demands an interdisciplinary approach.